New Delhi: Leading multinational companies, including Fujitsu and a top chip maker, has tapped Helion Venture Partners'-backed LinguaNext Technologies for using its technology that converts business software into local language. The Pune-based company has also converted direct benefit transfer scheme portals of leading oil PSUs into about a dozen local languages.

As more people from non-urban areas take to the internet, companies such as Google are taking keener interest in providing content in local languages for a larger adoption. And it is this change that the Pune-based company wants to cash in on.

Narendra Nayak, executive vice president at LinguaNext Technologies, said, "We have been tapped by Fujitsu and a major chip maker who have either used or are in the process of implementing our technology for offering their services in more languages in India and overseas." Nayak revealed that Fujitsu was using LinguifyCloud for getting their applications localised to multiple languages, including English. LinguifyCloud allows an existing application to be made mul-
